WHY TRADE WITH OTHER NATIONS?

Is money spent in foreign lands lost forever? Can the United States compete with cheap foreign labor? Will increased imports create even greater unemployment in this country? These and other questions are analyzed and discussed in a new series of leaflets on world trade according to Dr. Gene McMurtry, agricultural economist at Virginia Polytechnic Institute.

Foreign trade is just like any other kind of trade; it is based on the principle of specialization and exchange. The people in any country produce those goods and services for which they have a comparative advantage, and sell them to some other country for something that they would rather have. A country may have a relative advantage because of natural resources, labor or management skills, capital investments or techniques. The broadening of markets is necessary to realize fully the economic gains from specialization, production, and more effective competition. As shifts in production occur because of greater specialization, larger and more efficient plants become the standard of industrial production. This can best be accomplished with free movements of goods across political boundaries. Thus, by engaging in trade, the country improves its overall position. We generally import goods from foreign countries for one of three reasons—we can buy cheaper than we can produce, the quality is better than the goods at home, or our own production (volume) of the goods is too small to meet demands.

It is estimated that U.S. exports account for 3,000,000 jobs while imports provide another 1,000,000. In agriculture, the produce from one out of every six acres of farm land is sent to foreign markets. Slightly more than half of this is exported with some form of government assistance. Both the economy of the nation as a whole, and the strength of the agricultural segment depend heavily upon earnings from exports.

The U.S. exchanges many types of products with other countries. It must be remembered that world trade is an exchange of goods for goods. Of course, credit may be used to postpone the payment. Dollars spent within the U.S. borders are not "saved" nor are those spent abroad "lost." Those dollars spent abroad by Americans must eventually be used to purchase something back from this country.

Paying high wages does not prevent U. S. industries from competing strongly in the world market. The lower productivity of foreign workers tend to offset the economic advantage of their low wages. However, firms may find themselves at a competitive disadvantage by having a high labor-product ratio if U. S. tariffs are reduced and imports increased. The unemployment situation will depend upon the adjustment ability of our industries and types of governmental programs.

The U. S. holds an unusual position of being the world's leading industrial producer and food exporter. The economic future of the U.S. probably lies in the direction of freer trade with the rest of the world. However, it is important for each citizen to take the time to look at the contents of the merchandise that comes to us in the wrappings of "free trade."

Interested individuals may obtain a free copy of a special report entitled "World Trade." Ask your county agents or write to the department of agricultural economics. VPI, Blacksburg.
